

Write your own Landy Adventure

Writer's Tips

Here are some tips from Veronica herself, to help you write your Landy or Fender adventure!

- Decide whether you are going to write about Landy or Fender, or you can write about both of them!
- Make sure you get to know Landy and Fender, you can watch Veronica's read aloud books here and here, or you can find the actual books themselves here.
- Think of things they could do or get involved with – you can have Jack, Dan, Scamp and Molly in your story too. If you don't know who Jack, Dan, Scamp and Molly are, watch the videos above to find out!
- Find a piece of paper and write down all the ideas that come into your head, so you don't forget them.
- You don't have to use all the ideas and you might think of more later on, which you can add.
- Think of the outline for your story then put something in it that involves an emotion; it could be excitement or disappointment, happiness or sadness, bravery or fear, struggle or mystery ...and these are only a few ideas!
- If you need help with ideas; speak to people, look around you, use your own experiences, books and the internet. This is called research. Veronica speaks to lots of people when she writes her Landy and Friends books.

Here is some inspiration for what research you could do:

- You could find some pictures of Land Rovers doing cool and exciting things to give you ideas
- You could ask a grown up about something adventurous they've done in a Land Rover
- You could just make up a story about something that you'd like to see or do!
- Write a longer story, then edit, edit, edit! Take out all the unnecessary words and sentences. If you ramble too much, your story won't be so interesting. Remember your story must be no more than 500 words, so make sure they count!
- It's important to read your story out loud many times to hear what it sounds like – maybe read it to people in your family or friends. Keep correcting and improving it.
- The first part of the story sets the scene.
- The middle part of the story has the drama.
- The end brings the threads together – it's good if the ending can link in with something at the beginning of your story. Maybe there was a problem that needed solving ...did they manage to solve it? Or did they plan an adventure...did it happen and was it a happy or difficult adventure? Or did something happen to make them change their plans?

And the most important tip of all is.... to have fun! We can't wait to read your stories and we hope you enjoy writing them.
